

Many problems in systems biology have the goal of finding strategies to change an undesirable state of a biological system into another state through an intervention. The identification of such strategies is typically based on a mathematical model such as Boolean networks. In this talk we will see how to find node and edge interventions using computational algebra.